

I enjoyed hearing from our guest speaker, Tina Huynh. She provided excellent advice and solid points to help us in the future. In addition, she contributed to The Rambler as a content producer. She also described using audio kits and professional cameras to make this content.

I thought Tina made a good point when she described how competitive the field is in media. It can often simply be about who you know in the marketplace of work and ideas and not just about your skills. She also described that networking, research, and internships could help to close the gap when trying to get hired or find work. But, unfortunately, there are never enough advantages to be had in this field. Tina is providing more advice for us to follow those tracks with our last group of guest speakers, encouraging us to be versatile and open-minded.

Tina also enlightened us on the challenges that she faces in her career. One of these challenges is trying to get a video or content to go viral. This goes back to how competitive the marketplace of ideas is. There are always videos going viral, taking the attention away from other content producers. However, even though it is a competitive market, there are always opportunities for a job in her career field; with the level of influencers and social media marketers going through the roof, there will always be a need for content creators and individuals who can efficiently use it.

What a pleasure it hear from Tina. Everything she had discussed with us tracked what we heard from other guest speakers. Tina inspires me to get better at working with adobe programs and to become more creative. I appreciate that she shared her experiences and advice with us.