

What I learned from Danny Martin was that there is that there are plenty of viable and self-fulfilling careers in the field of ESports. I knew that they were actively scouring social media for the next significant gamers, content producers, and organizers that they feel can significantly impact their industry. There are pro-organizations and college organizations, and the former often scout the latter. Highly successful individuals in this field can make millions. They require representation and business speakers. Speakers that can express their needs and value to the rest of the economic field. Danny also explained how his dream began. He started out offering to help his doormates by offering to help them fix their consoles. This practice allowed him to turn a profit and also enabled him to perfect his self-pitch. He described how he had humble beginnings, growing up in Oak Cliff, Dallas. He would make money by selling barbecue and cutting yards, which allowed him to have the mindset of a worker. Danny also described how having a great mentor enabled him to connect to many different people and companies. This eventually led to a job opportunity in Silicon Valley that he promptly took. After learning a lot about the industry and contributing to great success in the ESports industry, Danny relocated back to Dallas, eventually helping to build Esposure. He explained how he was motivated to succeed in San Francisco due to the lack of success that he saw African Americans have in that city. His desire to be successful because of this is inspirational, as he was carrying what seemed like the weight of the world on his shoulders. It motivates me to search for a deeper purpose in everything I do because it can push me to accomplish and do extraordinary things or operate at an extraordinary level.